SOVIET MILITARY OBITUARIES SINCE THE AFGHAN INTERVENTION

An examination of the obituaries published in the Soviet military newspaper RED STAR during the period December 1979 - May 1980 shows no anomalies that can be ascribed to combat-related casualties resulting from the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. RED STAR's practices with respect to these obituaries--routine limits on the number published, the relatively high military ranks of the deceased, and the paucity of information provided about the officers and the causes of death--rule out the use of death notices to gauge the extent of losses in Afghanistan. Adherence to these practices squares with Moscow's policy of avoiding any indication in its media that the Soviet military force in Afghanistan is playing a major combat role or suffering casualties.

PUBLICATION PRACTICES

The RED STAR study showed that the Soviet obituary format effectively precludes the release of significant information on military losses:

- + RED STAR traditionally publishes only one obituary per issue, although it sometimes prints both a signed obituary for an important officer or official and an unsigned obituary for a less important officer or official. This artificial constraint has continued to be observed since the intervention in Afghanistan. Hence the number of death notices published cannot be taken as an indication of the number of deaths.
- + About three-fourths of the obituaries are for officers no longer on active duty.
- + Only officers of the rank of colonel (or equivalent) and above are accorded obituaries in RED STAR. Lower ranking officers who would be more likely to be engaged in combat are thereby excluded. During the six-month period under review, less than 40 percent of the military obituaries were for officers below the rank of general or admiral.
- + Obituaries never give the place or date of death.
- + Several formulas are used to describe the cause of death--including "sudden death" and "death on duty"--but there appears to be no significant correlation between the formula used and the deceased officer's involvement in the Afghanistan intervention. Only three of the obituaries since the intervention have specified that the death occurred during the performance of military service duties.

The table on the following pages summarizes information derived from an examination of RED STAR obituaries published during the periods December 1978 - May 1979 and December 1979 - May 1980.
